

There's way too much agglomeration, consolidation, and protectionism going on with establishment businesses, including or perhaps especially in media. We pay for XM radio and we wish that our carrier be free to broadcast any service that wishes to join the network.

A trade association of the establishment broadcasters -- of which most radio outlets seem to be controlled by Clear Channel -- certainly should not be using government to restrain other broadcasters' activities.

Surely Mr. Powell will not support fetters on the free exercise of business acumen. If XM radio has managed to come up with a better mousetrap, isn't it the American way to cheer on unbridled capitalism?
